Tim's Tip of the Day

In most cases the clouds in the sky give us some clue to expected weather. These clouds do not predict anything but they do have a very cool name. Altocumulus Castellanus are a motley layer of broken cloud usually above 6,000 feet. With some heat they can develop into cumulonimbus but with our low temperatures of late not much chance of that happening. \(Click here to see full size.\)

Find of the Day

Scientists link frozen spring to dramatic Arctic sea ice loss

European scientists have discovered the cause for this year's difficult winter and extended winter into what should be spring.

The loss of ice in the Arctic Ocean has altered the jet stream and cold arctic air continues to flow across the temperate part of the northern hemisphere. More trouble to come.

A couple of new things have shown up in Tisdale and both look like they are innovative and durable. Bow Mar Sale and John Bob Farm Equipment have been doing their research.
